Thirty years, a real international reputation, and an identity that looked generic doing it.

PICA programmed boundary-testing work under a brand that did not match its ambition. The brief was one line: Cultivating the Provocative.

A wordmark built from a building.

Every glyph is derived from the geometry of PICA's heritage tower: its curves, angles, and window proportions. The forms are slightly strange but pleasing because they carry the logic of a building, not of typographic convention. And any green is PICA green: in trees, clothing, the work itself.

A typeface drawn from one building's geometry can belong to no other institution, in no other place.

What cannot be transplanted cannot be copied.
That is the whole point.

The color isn't in a swatch.
PICA green is whatever green is already in the room: the trees, the crowd,
the work.

Brand is behavior, not image.

Nine landmark cultural rebrands, read by what forced the decision. Not by how they look. By what they do.
