

LEADERSHIP & RELEVANCE

National Ballet of Canada

Bruce Mau Design · 2024 · Place

An identity unchanged in nearly 20 years, in a category with a barrier problem.

Perceived exclusivity self-selects audiences out before they see a single performance. The brief: demolish the barrier without erasing the gravitas built over decades.

The mark and the text are one act.

A custom glyph makes the logo and body copy a single continuous typographic action. Type the mark, keep typing, the narrative flows without interruption. A shift to lowercase softens the register; motion is in the system from the start.

Make a brand frictionless to deploy, and people use it as designed.

You engineer the gap between intention and execution out of the system, instead of training around it.

No lockups to misuse, no clear-space to violate. You type, and the brand is correct by construction.

Brand is behavior, not image.

Nine landmark cultural rebrands, read by what forced the decision. Not by how they look. By what they do.
